In fact, some of the oldest recordings have simply been transfered from the actual film with the dialogue and other audio noises in the background. Vertigo, Psycho, Rebecca, Suspicion, Spellbound, Marnie and Family Plot are all re-recordings according to the CD booklet. I'm not quite sure if these films ever had original soundtracks to begin with.

Alfred Hitchcock's 30 Best Movies - IMDb

Herrmann's most recognizable music is from another Hitchcock film, Psycho. Unusual for a thriller at the time, the score uses only the string section of the orchestra. The screeching violin music heard during the famous shower scene (which Hitchcock originally suggested have no music at all) is one of the most famous moments in film score history.

Bernard Herrmann - Wikipedia

The Trouble with Harry doesn't quite seem like an Alfred Hitchcock film: It isn't all that suspenseful, the setting isn't busy, and the story is unusually quaint.. That said, The Trouble with Harry succeeds because it stands apart from the rest of Hitchcock's works. The best part of the film may very well be Bernard Herrmann's score, which was the first time he composed for Alfred ...

30 Best Alfred Hitchcock Movies Ranked for Filmmakers

In over half of Hitchcock's films, music is an essential component, often of fundamental importance to the plot. In The Lady Vanishes, Gilbert is a musicologist (really an ethnomusicologist) and music teacher and Miss Froy is also a music teacher.

The Lady Vanishes - Wikipedia

This has literally been regarded as the greatest film ever made, and not without good reason. Due to the surreal overtones, it's a visually arresting film, with intelligent recurring motifs and a lush urban setting. The swelling music is creative and unique, effortlessly melding with Hitchcock's meticulous camerawork.
