Peacebuilding and NGOs - Taylor & Francis

It will then seek, through a process of immanent critique, to determine whether the promotion of civil society has led to a more stable and peaceful state (a central claim of peacebuilding). In identifying when and why the state intervenes in NGO activity, the validity of liberalism's assumptions can be assessed.

NGOs working in various fields, but particularly women's rights, peacebuilding, arts, and culture were instrumental in opening up the space for local activism. Sonia Alvarez states that NGOs can have a "hybrid character", meaning that some NGOs can be more like grassroots movements, since they direct their resources towards consciousness-raising and mobilization (Alvarez 1999, 189).

Peacebuilding is intended to transform the patterns of politics within a state through the re/imposition of the characteristics of 'normal' politics, including democratic governance, liberal markets and the creation of civil society. Peacebuilding practices, however, are not applied on a tabula rasa; rather, the peoples that occupy the country have histories of their own, with particular social dynamics.

Peacebuilding and NGOs - Taylor & Francis Group

"One of the most interesting studies on civil society, the role of NGOs, and peacebuilding published recently, it has much to recommend it." - Oliver Richmond, University of Manchester, UK
"In approaching the logic of peacebuilding from the perspective of Critical Security Studies, this book bridges a gap in the literature..."

This paper advances the notion of civil non-state actors in peacekeeping and peacebuilding. Using Sierra Leone, Liberia, and Côte d'Ivoire as case studies, the paper identifies three kinds of civil non-state actors in war-torn countries: international non-governmental organizations (NGOs), community-based NGOs, and
